Provo Canyon was blocked for a time Wednesday afternoon when a diesel tanker rolled over on the first turn below Deer Creek Dam.

The blockage came on a day when Parleys Canyon closed after a landslide tore away part of I-80.

Utah Highway Patrol troopers said the rollover occurred around 2 p.m. Wednesday when the diesel tanker developed problems with its steering mechanism and the truck rolled over, landing on its top.

The driver, Edward White of Spanish Fork, is listed in "serious" condition at the Utah Valley Regional Medical Center, in the intensive care unit. His wife Shirley suffered minor injuries but was not reported to be in the local hospital.

Some diesel fuel leaked from the overturned truck but none got into the reservoir, troopers reported.

Provo Canyon will soon be closed to oversized and overweight trucks

Provo Canyon will be closed to oversized and overweight trucks in 30 days.

The Utah Transportation Commission voted unanimously Friday to ban the large trucks from the canyon, forcing them to detour north onto I-80 through Parley's Canyon east of Salt Lake City. The one exception to the ban will be those companies with existing contracts based on hauling materials through Provo Canyon.

Several trucking representatives were on hand Friday to argue against the ban, noting they had won Central Utah Water Project contracts base on bids that required them to travel through Provo Canyon. By forcing them to travel through Salt Lake County, the commission was adding several hours of drive time and increasing the cost as much as $4 a ton for raw materials.

Several residents of Provo Canyon also attended the commission meeting, arguing for stricter controls on trucks using Provo Canyon. Most preferred a complete ban on large trucks — something the commission is not authorized by law to do.

State Department of Transportation spokesman Kim Morris, commenting on the amendment that would allow some companies to continue using the canyons, said those companies "entered their contracts in good faith and should not be penalized."

However, those companies with existing contracts that have renegotiation clauses will be required under the ban to renegotiate their contracts based on hauling the raw materials through Salt Lake County, Morris said.

Some contracts do not have renegotiation clauses. Those companies will be allowed to continue using the canyon until their contracts expire. The Utah Highway Patrol and UDOT will review all existing contracts to determine on a case-by-case basis which companies will be allowed to continue using Provo Canyon.
